Multicenter pilot study comparing outcomes of laparoscopic mesh-augmented repair of recto-vaginal fistula. The laparoscopic approach for the treatment of recto-vaginal fistula (RVF) is less common than the open approach. The aim of this study was to evaluate the efficacy of the laparoscopic mesh-augmented repair for RVF. Between November 2003 and April 2009, four institutions participated in this prospective multicenter trial. One hundred seven patients with RVF (n = 101) or recto-vaginal/ureteric junction stricture (n = 6) were enrolled. All patients underwent a standardized laparoscopic mesh-augmented repair, including placement of a rectangle piece of polyglactin mesh between the posterior vaginal wall and the anterior rectal wall. Patients were evaluated using a perineal score and a visual analogue scale (VAS), to assess improvement of symptoms and quality of life. The median follow-up was 21 months (range, 2-58). The postoperative perineal score was significantly higher (P = .03) and the VAS score significantly lower (P = .03). Those are just a few of the many reasons I've chosen to become an Independent.

A new genetic test for endometriosis will be available to doctors across the UK, with the first results expected in 2017. The GeneMRT Endometriosis Test, developed by London-based Precision Medicine, is offered to all women in the UK with unexplained infertility and those with recurrent pain who have been diagnosed with pelvic endometriosis. Endometriosis is a condition where tissue from the lining of the uterus grows outside the uterus, most commonly in the pelvis and abdominal wall. The condition affects up to one in 10 women, with one in five of these diagnosed with endometriosis, which is associated with infertility, pain, and a risk of developing ovarian cancer. The GeneMRT Endometriosis Test is approved by the National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE) and the British Medical Association (BMA). To date, the test has been used in over 3,700 women to demonstrate genetic risk. The test consists of a genetic test involving the 'omics' technology developed at the Leeds Institute of Genetics and Molecular Medicine and precision next-generation sequencing. Results are available in three to six months, and the test is cost-effective compared to alternative diagnostic tests. Commenting on the development of the genetic test, Paul Andrews, Chief Executive of the British Society of Human Reproduction said: "Endometriosis is a common disease of the reproductive organs, with symptoms that can cause considerable distress to women and considerable pain to their partners. "We have a long way to go in bringing more genetic tests to routine clinical practice and this is the first test available for the condition. Although it does not diagnose endometriosis, it does give a useful indication of genetic risk, which can be discussed with women and their partners

I decided to get this thread started because it's very hard for a non technical user to buy a flier and see if it will work in their planes, and if it's cheaper than the original. First thought in this thread: "5-2-09" but I decided against that. I have been looking for a good replacement for the stock Ezy Flier since being able to order it so I'm sure the 5 and 2 fly out of my mind at this point. You would think the cost would be about the same price as the original Ezy Flier, maybe it's just me though. Starting out, I will put some of the options out there to see if you have any experience with them or if there is a better choice out there. The five and two: I can vouch for these, they do fly and I can even find them for sale. They do seem to be the same price as the original Flier but I don't know if they are as good or have similar all around quality. The other T2 and other so on I've never seen one of these but it seems to be a better choice but I'd like to hear some opinions as to what you think. My main issues with the 5 and 2 are the weight and that it seems to only have one battery. But it seems to be made cheaper and in higher volumes. The other T2 and other so on are quite a bit different from the 5 and 2. I guess these are made to replace the original Flier so I'm not too familiar with them. Any suggestions/feedback would be appreciated. (sorry, if any of this was in the wrong
